

GQ remains top boutique for employers In Chambers

In its recently published 2017 edition, leading legal directory Chambers has continued to rank GQ as the leading employment boutique for employers in the UK.

Chambers & Partners' guide describes us as a "Highly experienced boutique employment law firm offering expert advice to large financial services clients and other high-profile organisations. Deep bench of practitioners handles both contentious and non-contentious matters, with marked success in complex litigation."

Based on extensive research among clients, the guide says GQ's strengths include:

"The team are great. They give a really personal service to us and it doesn't matter how small the task is, they treat us like we are their one and only client."

"They are a high-performing team who communicate well with each other and the client."

The guide has again recognised GQ lawyers as leaders in their field, saying Paul Quain is respected by sources because he "communicates very clearly, has a great manner with the client and is very calm" and "his knowledge and attention to detail are second to none."

Chambers also recommends Sophie Vanhegan for her "broad employment practice, advising clients on both contentious and non-contentious matters. Particularly noted for her work on employment litigation, with experience of complex discrimination and whistle-blowing claims."

Chambers' full review of GQ can be read here.